Let Them Hustle for Themselves.

It is nature's plan that the hen shall labor during the favorable months of summer and recuperate while conditions are less favorable during winter. So well has this plan been worked out, that he who undertakes to modify it encounters numerous opposing influences. However, painstaking poultrymen have worked out methods by which nature is induced to reserve her machine having the period of recuperation come in summer when the price of egg produce is low. Under proper management this scheme has proved successful and in many instances very profitable.

To what extent the average farmer can engage in winter egg production and be assured of fair compensation depends in a large measure upon conditions, however, after several years' experience I believe a far greater number could profitably engage in the business. During the winter months eggs command high prices and so far as the market is concerned, it is steady.

Successful winter egg production is based upon a few fundamental laws that must be considered. The breed of fowls used is very important, but as we must take conditions as we find them upon the average farm, we will here consider winter egg production simply from the farmer's point of view. The poultry house need not be an expensive or elaborate structure so long as it possesses certain characteristics. It must be located upon slightly elevated ground so as to insure good drainage and dryness. There are instances where slight excavations can be made for protection, but good drainage should always be kept in mind. Dryness is one of the most important requisites of a poultry house where winter egg production is to be carried on. I know of no other one thing that will stop hens from laying quicker than a damp poultry house. Unless properly located it is simply impossible to maintain dryness.

Ventilation is important, impure air is productive of dampness and of unhealthy conditions. No one can expect good results from fowls during winter unless supplied with fresh air. There are several good systems, but I have been well pleased with the one I have in use. The ventilator is located in the center of the building and leads by means of branches to each end of the building. Two branches are at each end which open at the bottom or near the floor. Here the impure air finds exit and fresh air is brought in from the top by means of another similar system. This method of ventilation works well and I have never been troubled with dampness in my poultry house.

The feed supplied the flock has much to do with results, successful poultrymen differ slightly as to the nature of food during the winter laying season. I have shifted my methods several times, but have come to the conclusion that better results are realized by sticking to one system. My present method that is giving good results consists first of plenty of litter to scratch in. It may consist of straw or leaves so long as light and fine. My first feeding in the morning is warm wheat bran mash, sufficiently damp to steam well, but not so water can be squeezed out. Don't feed slushy food to laying hens. This feed is supplied in troughs. Great care is exercised not to feed more than fowls will readily consume. I desire them to be hungry after feeding. Early in the morning or the previous evening after the fowls have gone to roost I scatter through the litter wheat screenings stirred in by means of a fork. When I leave the house in the evening I draw the curtains over the windows so as to keep it dark until a little past daybreak. Then I raise the curtains and feed my bran mash before the fowls have found the screenings. In this way I am able to feed a warm mash before the fowls fill up with something else. It varies a little each morning as to time of feeding, but I have never yet failed with this method when properly carried out. It is night in the hen house until the curtains are raised and the fowls are quiet until fed. As soon as they finish the mash ration they are sufficiently hungry to go to scratching and obtain plenty of exercise.

At noon I do not feed any grain, but meat. This meat is purchased at the market, ground in a cutter and fed liberally. The fowls partake and do better than though a grain ration was fed. I consider meat one of the most important of foods for laying fowls. It can be obtained in two ways either by purchasing at the market or by killing some old animal that has passed its usefulness. The latter method is the cheapest during the cold weather as the meat will keep without injury. At night I feed at four o'clock in the afternoon a light ration of corn, oats and wheat screenings. I desire to feed early in the day so as to give the fowls plenty of time to exercise before going to roost.

The drink supplied the fowls should vary with conditions. During the cold weather it should be warmed, but not hot. I feed considerable milk to my fowls. I consider it one of the best foods in the way of drink obtainable. However, precaution should be taken not to overfeed. Feed sparingly and often if best results are desired. Clean water should always be kept before laying fowls.

SHATTERED DREAMS.

"Well, I've done Europe," remarked the girl who had come into money, "and Asia and Africa—and I've done with them forever!"

"What?" cried the other girl. "I thought your one desire was to keep traveling for the rest of your life. You said so when you came into—"

"O, don't remind me of what I said," exclaimed the other one, bitterly, "and don't remind me of my dead dreams. I'm wide awake now, anyhow."

"Tell me all about it," urged the other sympathetically.

"Of course I will. I am dying to sob it out on somebody's shoulder. You know how I used to dream and dream of seeing Rome—and the Coliseum? You remember how I used to plan what I should do when old Uncle William should leave me my fortune? You recollect how I used to keep pictures around my room of the Coliseum by moonlight, and of the Sphinx and St. Peter's, and all of that? Well, I got to Rome, and the moment I had unpacked my grip at one of their unromantically comfortable hotels I went down to the clerk and inquired where I could get a carriage to the Coliseum—and what do you think he said?"

"I don't know," replied the other in an awed tone.

"You'd better take a trolley, miss. That's what he said! Fancy! A trolley car running to the Coliseum! When I had recovered from the shock I comforted myself with the thought that I might forget that trolley in the joy of viewing that grand old ruin by moonlight; so I did get on the clanging thing and went in it."

"And was it beautiful by moonlight?"

"I don't know, and I never shall know. There was a great big arc light hanging right in the middle of the thing—and if there was any moonlight you couldn't see a sign of it."

"O!" breathed the other, sadly.

"But that wasn't the worst," moaned the girl who had been to Europe. "I got out of Rome as soon as I could. I was afraid to go to St. Peter's, my dear, for fear his holiness should address the congregation through a megaphone; so I hurried to Venice. I had longed all my life to ride in a gondola on those ghost-haunted, moonlit canals. My soul had sighed for the sound of a guitar tinkling in the distance and the soft splash of the oars in blue Venetian waters. I wanted to float past Brown-ing's palace and the palaces of all those dear old dead dukes and poets and painters. It was with nerves tingling with anticipation that I arrived in Venice—to be met by a jaunty, puffing, fendish little steam launch that carried me all around the canals and past the palaces before I had even time to think, much less to dream, while a guide with a megaphone told us all about it in a voice that should have raised the royal dead from their graves."

"But the Sphinx," pleaded the other girl, "surely they haven't mutilated the Sphinx."

"I don't know," replied the traveled girl, wearily. "By the time I had arrived in Egypt I had lost my appetite for romance and I was perfectly calm when they put me in a trolley car bound for the Sphinx. And I never even bothered to climb it, because the guide assured me that I could do that much more easily a year or so hence, when they had finished building the electric elevator, now being constructed in it."

"And Mecca," sighed the other, hope-fully. "Surely you went to Mecca as you had planned?"

"No," was the caustic rejoinder. "Our party decided not to go to Mecca this time. They are building a steam railway so that pilgrims to the tomb may go quite comfortably in a year or so. Won't that be delightful?"

"I should have died!" groaned the other.

"So should I—right then and there," declared the disillusioned one, "but I was afraid to. I was afraid somebody would suggest that I ought to wait until they finished an airship line to heaven!"—Detroit Free Press.

ASTONISHING ACROBATICS.

Startling Feats Performed by Entertainers of Different Nationalities.

Paris, at least, is enjoying novelties in the vaudeville line even if other cities may be bored by stale acts. The French are leading all other countries in the production of unique acts.

One of the startling feats accomplished by a performer has won him brief fame. He is an acrobat who, after many difficult feats, finally places a candle on top of a table and stands upside down with one hand only on the candle, balancing himself in that position.

Three Japanese performers have improved and made more daring the old circus "slide for life," the three coasting down a slightly slack wire at a terrible angle to the stage.

There is an Indian juggler, discovered by some enterprising Parisian vaudeville manager, who walks the slack wire and, while balancing there, performs the most difficult tricks of juggling—feats which the ordinary performer would not attempt on the solid floor.

But above them all in popular favor stands the juggler who is declared to be the most wonderful that has appeared in Paris for a long time. He does all the stock tricks of the vaudeville juggler, and a lot of new ones juggling everything on the stage—chairs, tables, lamps, rugs, umbrellas, cigars, everything, and he does it all while keeping one hand in his trousers' pocket through the entire act.
